

New Talis Additions partnership programme makes joined up solutions available to libraries

17th May 2005

Talis has launched Talis Additions, a partnership programme that will give libraries more potential for 'joined-up' solutions. Through the programme, Talis will forge close links with a network of complementary partners to offer a wider choice of solutions that can be designed to meet specific customer requirements.

"Libraries recognise the benefits of sharing information more freely between systems," says Lee Cox, head of product development at Talis. "But, while applications such as electronic resource management have great potential, the real value is only realised when they are integrated with core library management systems effectively and easily.

"Talis Additions will open up a greater choice of solutions to our customers as well as helping them to gain even more value from existing systems. We believe it's the first step towards a very exciting future of greater integration between vendors."
